Megan Rennyay is in a heap of trouble because she thought she was doing the right thing. A web of deceit is spun in the small town of Carsonburg through the good church members and anyone Megan comes into contact with. Lying and maintaining a low profile is a matter of survival for Megan and a way for her to pursue the study of healing. She's on her own until an unlikely married couple from church come by her apartment one evening, needing her help-the same two people who didn't speak up in her defense when she was told to leave her church. Skeptical of their motives, at first, she then decides to help them. Megan's latest temp job is working at the answering service from six to midnight. It's just she and the janitor. Thinking this will be the perfect place for her and the couple to meet without anyone finding out, the web of deceit spreads through the mysterious phone calls and one unidentifiable pager number.

Molly, in this book, seeks to help others and is kind to everyone. She is not worldly and often gets caught up in some pretty bad messes. She manages to resolve her problems with the help of her friend Lois. She is caring and helpful in many dire situations. Where another would walk away, she would stay to assist a friend. She and Lois have been friends since school. They helped each other to grow up and find their way in life. Molly is puzzled about how her husband Frank had died. The sheriff says someone killed him. Lois is trying to help Molly find out who killed Frank. In between, things keep getting really messed up by others. Molly had trusted Frank, and he had turned around and found himself another woman. Molly resolves to change her life and find a way out of her marriage.
